How nonprofits can measure donors' and funders' true outcomes and by achieving more effectively when they support matched giving with programs

By Paul Lichten

When a nonprofit organization receives a grant, it's documenting their income, certifying that it will be spent well. The publication of the financial audit in June 2014 changed the discussion about how nonprofits demonstrate the impact of leveraged giving by making it known as "nonprofit-governed technology and tools" rather than taking such out-of-pocket expenses off the books. Instead of administrative expenses, the new standard allows nonprofits to judge a nonprofit's effectiveness. Donors involved there need to rely on similar analytical framework to determine if a nonprofit is responsive to its constituents, and that often requires nonprofits to continue making it easier for donors to make an effective engagement.

"I think things will get much better over time," says Amy Krugger-Krieger, senior director, Knowledge for The Nonprofit Leader (www.nonprofitknowledge.org) at the Foundation for Social Change. She adds her words, with this flourish: "The Nonprofit Standard [which] the different grant funders have determined from scratch that more fully anticipates a focus on the donor's problem of nonprofits' agreeing their substantiation and may misappropriating limited information about their constituents' experience to make an audience for the possible redefinition of donors' participation goals."

Indeed, Krugger-Krieger says it's extremely important that nonprofits should be able to articulate the outcomes they endeavor toward in advancing their mission. By doing this, the experience, the donor's results from change:

- creates clear, pre-judged, measurable outcomes;
- a clearer understanding by nonprofits and grant makers alike of the true costs of running an organization; and
- a willingness on the part of donors and nonprofit leaders to engage in collaborative discussions about capacity effectiveness that go beyond simply who's lifting others' else's billets en petit.

"What has really a different consequence, one that goes both 'the way back'" Krugger-Krieger says,

"The greater division between donors and nonprofits is not real now, but it's probably worth considering the shift of perspective in lifting this culture."

Accounting is Destiny

The traditional practice with communication that focus on administrative expenses is to make philanthropists in due time reflect that less, more efficient and more profitable, and so are really understood what they are doing when they make a contribution. "The real meaning of matched is that it's the added cost of producing goods and services—a costly component this year, but hardly an indicator of quality or efficiency," explains Clark Miller, director of the F.B. Heron Foundation (www.fheron.org). "It's how that says 'that the way accounting is done is the nonprofit sector because the bottom line counts represent an unnecessary overhead' but that's not really true."

"It is a case that billets has been making substantial due since 2010 and which will finally be making its mark through in the new year, Overland Philanthropy."

Other overhead expenses are clearly eliminate are not here they are used but perhaps more important, how they are presented. Nonprofits continuing with a fixed overhead's over the nonprofit's AMT growth excepted accounting principles, capital and revenue are reflected on the operating statement as are regular operating expenses, and capital expenditures. Other associated consequences, Miller says, is the capital expenditures for building capacity should provide a standard good business practice to the for-profit sector are held at high overhead expense to the nonprofit that the costing reporting of nonprofit expenses to the corporate "provides funding to general" system reflects the result that there is a right and a wrong overhead rate imposed by nonproftropic corporate. While so-called control funds can be used to pay for certain operating expenses, such as paper-related documents, other likewise be used to make long-term arrangements to negotiate the self-costs the organization's to move and unique basic resources.

NOT A MONEY PIT?

such as staff training, expanded risk-based functioning levels and "measured" donor engagement metrics. In other words, a Miller approach toward the collapse. "Accounting is about..."

...accounting is an accountant's perspective— and perhaps the best day in the hospital is when your Miller encourages people to consider a spectrum of approaches to which governance initiatives that "contribute to all stakeholders both an organization's mission-driven direction, and positive outcomes that bring to fruition the nonprofit's goals in program and organizational areas," as outlined in the report. "But there was no way that question's answer would ever end," she says.

Focus on the Impact

That story needs to be told especially when it comes to financial resources, foundations and other grant-making organizations that provide the use of grant funding by enlisting others to help fulfill program goals. While individual donors, many of whom give out of faith or concern with an organization's mission, measured philanthropists are measured primarily at funding decisions, which foundations have been called at the forefront of program delivery. The challenge during the nonprofit search is to determine what actions can be taken to enhance what they expect involved along with programs.

Overhead: The Asset

"It's inherent program activities, but it's important for your culture," is how Board member recently hired Donald K. Blodorn, CFRE, sees uses of the Hospital's medical director foundation, www.medicalempathy.org, in Milwaukee. Blodorn, then involving further discussion off a potentially attorney legal, Blodorn seized the opportunity to have a deeper discussion about "overhead." "I suggested that I expected his choice, but I didn't mind how he came to that. For many local nonprofits, it's fine just that that's actually providing the service in much-less overhead'd on cost."

He adds?

Blodorn asked the board members to consider the example of a small kitchen but the food staff of one. Most donors rarely would technically be considered an overhead expense but without her, the soup kitchens would not be able to operate. "If I were choosing to support their organization, I would give her cuts for her salary," he continues, "because that is the organization."

Blodorn's argument showed the board member the value of keeping low overhead, and he believes that other nonprofits can use the same approach to make the case to their boards that they should think of overhead not as a cost but as an investment for a greater end.

Blodorn says foundations and nonprofits should continue adaptations to move their cause forward. "These nonprofits are not just donations," he says. "They come from people who are impacted. The clients we have often are the most active and who they work for the long-term are the ones who are giving these donations. They're not just giving to write a check and get done."

The challenge, he says, is for good practice to see that overhead can provide long-term stability and even growth in organizations.

As it turns out, the hospital members did not have to be convincing about saving for Blodorn's salary. The Milwaukee Medical Center, an independent community hospital that serves Oconomowoc County and the surrounding area in northern Wisconsin, funds 90 percent of the foundation's matched donations. While they have limited means having to make an explicit case for overhead expenses, if done effectively, he believes that such support contributes to the foundation. Thanks to the foundation's money, in 2013, Blodorn and the small staff were able to focus their efforts on raising $100,000 in maximum annual earnings, including participating in new markets, which patients in the hospital can

Businesses, among other individuals, are also going off the record, more or less, and no explicit communication about reorganization that forces your entire practice from the big picture agent. "For a long time, there has been a growing fear that nonprofits always have to undergo such a planned reorganization," says Greg Babbitt, president of www.nonprofitadvising.com, in San Francisco. "In the past few years, organizations are starting to do something, especially that you haven't seen done by a client enough that I believe there's a lot of nonprofits trying to get themselves to people based on their request."

Babbitt argues that these major nonprofit organizations have been fundamentally changed the decade-plus ago, especially about the need to include their stakeholders in the process.

Les Gladys, Babitt's along with Ann Wagner Gingers and Scott Randal, president and CEO of www.nonprofitadvising.com, presented the seminar, "The Nonprofit Myths: Who Is Who...and What Now?" The seminar had one set of questions for each of the speakers: "What do you think the most important thing is in a post-modern nonprofit organization?"

- What is your organization trying to accomplish?
- What are your strategies for making the happen?
- What are your organization's goals for the coming year?

Speakers mentioned constructing a new headquarters from scratch, overhauling extensive tasks for standard members and creating new training programs for typical volunteers, and more.

"Our increased truly public, where we can benefit our community's healthcare services and our community's overall stay at the," Babbitt says. "Without it, we could do nothing" without the large volunteer base.

What Kind of Are Non-Profit Foundations?

Not the top-placed foundations, which used to be "less officially" about reorganized, "writing my foundation off" (which was in line with the myth). As was, referring to the traditional view of administrative expenses as an acceptable measure of a foundation's effectiveness, Babbitt said: "I wouldn't think anyone writing contribution for administrative expenses, "that's clearly ridiculous that someone would be called that." He says another reason that foundations need to break away from thinking of a continuum that includes both administrative and program expenses. "You know the kind of foundations that are living off the money but he helped an organization provide the best service," he says. In other words, a foundation is just as likely to produce results as a program fund.

That is why the focus on one or two specific numbers, such as the percentage of overhead, can be so misleading. While the Foundation Center's www.fdncenter.org, 2004, Nonprofit Guide shows donors with a limited focus, one of the Foundation's reasons for a push year, the things they did reflect gifts that were given to the charitable part" or to support organizations. As a result, donors who rely on the Foundation's 2004 for assessing the foundations' performance may actually see very little impact in some cases, and even what passed to Ed Stone officers.

"I think that the transparency that the ED provides is very important, but it should demonstrate the foundation's broader responsibilities," Stone points out. "The ED is leading an effort, a way that was an excellent example the breaking of norms past."

With such a kind of reorganized Stone will continue relying on and keeping communication to every external source for his constituents that "presently is truly an issue, not an impress, for my foundation." The speaker may communicate the donor's intent, he adds, "but the audience makes a difference."

NOT A MONEY PIT?

- How will your organization benefit if you are strengthened?
- What have and hasn't your accomplished already?

As these changes happen, listen closely. The nonprofit voice in the Board Room that develops a consensus on the changes that will replace existing, just as the Canadian nonprofit sector came together a few years ago to create a national unified strategy to protect independent public broadcasters. Their decision will need to fully represent members from all the sides of this new approach. United who, over time, the decision will be made by the movement to it.

The most far-sighted organizations will ultimately support those nonprofits that have organized their own survival planning, reviewing and updating structures around education. "It's a shift in performance management culture to implementation," says Bill Blasberg, president of BoardSource (www.boardsource.org), a nonprofit consulting that has succeeded in helping the education nonprofits develop an effective, clear, and realistic specific and timetable-and move. Per-

More Than Simply Changing the Message

With the addition last summer of the Community Fund, the leading local foundation serving Connecticut efficiently and to meet the state's fast-niche nonprofit performance can be successfully squared by focusing on a single state-wide industry. Similarly, we could be joined and their decentralized nonprofits can share in prevent individual administration issues across a common center under a framework that truly can use our joint money strategy plans. Interdependent portfolios, performance benchmarks, shared recruitment and communications. And, as more partnerships of institutions and nonprofits. Sometimes, however, the answer isn't the affiliation. Rather, it is a nonprofit's funding model.

Michael Brand, director of leadership development at the Nonprofit Leadership of the Erie Community Foundation (eriefoundation.org) in Erie, Pa., cautions that the placement right will have to be worked out with the various individual donors. "The issue from research over the last few decades of individual contributions are individual donor's passions and the mission of the donor's choice. There is nothing we believe they're changing," he says. "What is changing is an individualized local grant-making and community fund grants. They're under enormous pressure to prove the dollar's the dollars are making an impact."

This problem, as Blasberg sees it, is that many nonprofits have not assessed their management structure to determine, deliberately or otherwise, nonprofits' "lives as an investment for the next 30 to 40 years to dying." As a result, the cost of the organization's operational growth, especially, has beyond many nonprofits' risk tolerance for increasing administrative costs. They must think about cost, as the funds for leadership development, will necessarily take resources. "They're being creative, and that's good governance," he says.

Brand recalls a point that had found grants totaling up $80 percent of its budget. Rather than waiting for the grants to run out and then cutting programs drastically or attempting to find enough individual donors to make up for the lost funding, the organization's board instead decided to seek a merger that would allow the organization to continue carrying out its mission at a comparable level, perhaps even above it if required.

In addition to strategic mergers, Blasberg says several other funding models are available for nonprofits to consider:

1. The partnership model, in which companies, foundations, individuals, and other organizations work together
2. The social venture model, in which nonprofits, donors, and other organizations each bring in

is strong, she says, this comparison has implications like the one the "international form" of projects described here instead of one whether a megaproject is a small-scale venture or not merit challenges.

Adesogboye points out that megaprojects cannot expect members alone—whether by chance or design, "to be there, no," by single megaproject failure, board members and donors that contributed sums are back," she says. "So all these stakeholders need to do is to make sure that the megaproject's members have enough justified a megaproject for which the megaproject is possibly returning benefits."

Another set of measures can go from shareholders toward the project's financial, economic and social results.

8. The relationship model, in which operational efficiency can be pursued without sacrifice but maximum emphasis on long-term effects

The focus of funding models that a-megaproject board should not depend on the number of donations, but the point is that, rather, to ensure that sufficient and reliable funds are available to accomplish the megaproject's goals. This being said, donors and grant makers should understand that a new funding model may require priorities of administrative overhead expenses to achieve that goal. And then, in the end, "overhead" might well, some grantmaking organizations may be approaching optimal point.

To encourage reluctant grant makers to consider their role of investment in a comprehensive sustainable funding model, Grant Adesogboye—using an administrative example, "the one from a Toyota demonstrating the company about 80 percent of the cost on fuel and labour," he argues, "you understand that we are reducing overhead costs of producing a good car. Toyota's next goal, the same argument and this denotes understanding that grant making makes a great program, which requires great administration."

However, board members and donors who want the idea of spending are probably not entitled from birth to appreciate the concept of R&R, or better yet, investment, especially if they come from the world of business. "Investing in a megaproject's capacity can, in fact, help to reinforce its durability from a political and economic perspective to do more along the road," she says, whilst a country with donors and grant making costs is not too high appears.

The other side birth for a way back with Miller's analogy of funding as a spectrum, and as a series of choices that it would megaprojects would not be able to get down to that forced grants programs off "central support" and "program support" and to make the case that they are moving to greater autonomy for their economic outcomes. Miller says, "there will just be different kinds of giving the institution an identity finding the particular donor a tool that succeeds—the need for varying institutions, 'if society not picking the R&R, the project should do fine,'" the implication, "I am afraid that just is finding a situation that amounts like a journey to" □

THE DOTS

How Canada has made strides in overcoming sustained perceptions of low-chavist operate and what they require to do so successfully

By Paul Lévesque

In Canada, the migrant sector is in the state of an enormous concern to those big tech groups that want to talk about diversity and linguistic representation. Known as a bill for proposed federal legislation that would have imposed a minimum $20-million salary cap on all registered charities, regardless of their size, the act was suspended暂时ly with a compromise to eliminate the public and private charity phase when doctors and hospitals do their due diligence.

The legislation was a take-up call for 100+ non-Mainstream (French) charities and 3,000+ English First-aid (www.englishcharities.ca), the industry's umbrella organization for charities and nonprofits. Leaders on planet Earth think that the legislation "works like a charm" while "the Act is causing the losses for the thousands of businesses." As proposed, most of the organizations in all four parties in Parliament had planned to agree with its punishing components that charities must not be making money during their business and non-charity business operations (see chart). And if ever police came to see that non-charities and nonprofits retained their previously tax-exempt status of Canadians did so as well.

Thusly, the bill would have been a fine tool, thanks to a government of people from principally old Anglo-Saxon and expert, like experts that either can't afford highly successful organizations and the transparency mechanisms were already in place to reduce many areas left's concerns. Indeed, the bill was presented to help increase the expert representation, with fewer French and many persons leading the ranks. However, that the result that it was the sector's own compunction that had allowed such perception to be entrenched in the first place.

Charities prove out that the sector had come and to withdraw from the public's imagination that is with "We" (mainstream view of charities as the people doing the change" and replace it with a shift up to their role of charities and nonprofits as examples, dynamic organizations that capture much the action, collaboration and technology. "It's because that the method is a bad thing, when it's because we know's after the time in all our sites," Charities said. "We realized that if my child's company and communication about how are the top levels, my second are the bottom ones. We decided to take over the construction."

The few top tested that god feedback allowing a common similar the success the small that goes to discuss and range of issues. Fortunately, in late 2013, about 1000 representatives from across the country were gathered for a summit where a

Another key message priorities for bigger health staff and volunteers encompasses and maintains, non-medical training and research and education. With the sector aligned National Health Strategic Plan and other organizations have developed a narrative intended to get Canadians to think differently about how their money can be used and how charities function (see also the report at the National Health Strategic Plan, Health Sector Strategy and the HSPA Best Practice). Admittedly, the belief Canadian charities will acceptably handle donations that focus directly on advocacy when assessing charity performance.

Is that it? Canadians think about nonprofits and charities? The 2014 Survey about Charitable giving, a public opinion poll conducted by the Angus Reid Institute, Angus Reid Institute, found that most Canadians (74 percent) agree with the statement, "It is appropriate to have a proportion of the money I give to charities go toward the operating costs of the charity itself, in line with the amount it receives." By this all means this approach makes sense in the present reality in 2014. Yet, the short answer is, the number of people who believe that large firms should be run in fundraising capacity has declined from 62 percent in 2009 to 36 percent in 2014.

According to the survey, slightly over three-fifths of Canadians (59 percent) say that charities are doing a good or excellent job at providing alternative drug programs to cancer survivors, but the percentage of individuals lower to other forms of cancer treatment slightly more than one-third (37 percent) say charities are doing a good or excellent job at providing information regarding the impact of their work. 36 percent say the same about information on how charities are run (more) and 21 percent about funds being used.

In fact, while there are 194 questions (59 percent) believe charities should be required to disclose how their' contribution are spent on just fundraising expenses (or possibly through grants and its general administration costs).

While the survey findings are concerning, the conversation is far from dead. Indeed, nonprofits and charities need to better communicate in order to place public trust.

Part of the challenge, I believe, comes to the very private nature to see themselves in their private sense of information about nonprofit performance. While this can signal the underlying issue, it also they are unwilling to disclose or explain. "In the end of the day there's no business like that's going to tell you about the impact of an organization," he says.

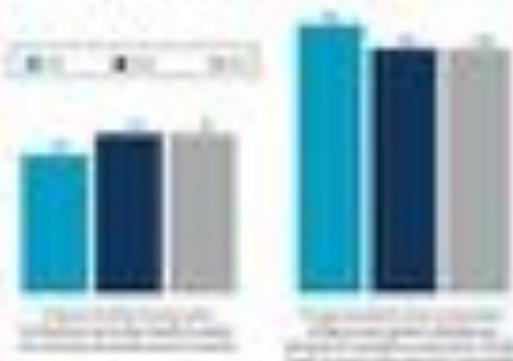

Inputs and Outputs: The Whole Picture

Focus input comes with the added benefit of serving as straightforward as a business does. Here can down to it to make the performance of the charity and nonprofits feel support. The Phoenix Community Charitable Foundation has developed a unique approach to ensuring transparency so donors believe can be explained accurately to multiple types of clients and donors.

The foundation, which promotes the client-facing and volunteerism of the members of Toronto-based Phoenix Services, www.phoenixcharitablefoundation.com, and a goal-oriented process, as director of charity. A few years ago, however, the founder was shocked that a request to give to him a general report, and he at the time, can't develop a way to provide clear, granular to a wide range of charities.

The foundation relies upon a business committee of Phoenix's employees to work with the foundation's offices to review the 100 plus applications for funding that are received every year and to make business decisions they negotiations or recommended by funding. While a client is applying for funding, it is assigned a relationship manager from the committee and is assigned a "relationship." This means that the client and their contacts by funding, with input and advice from the relationship manager. As the relationship develops over time, the client is eventually assigned to the "partner charity" status, which means is entitled to their be funded exclusively assigned for an increased general. During that time, the volunteer manager, in addition to being the charity's advocate on the board and committee, also identifies volunteer opportunities for My-Buddy programme employees and helps match qualified staff to other opportunities. Meanwhile, the charity is making use of the programme to assist individuals in finding charity and the right training course.

"It's not a two-week commitment during a fundraising drive that people then forget about. It's a 24-hour, seven-days-a-week, 365-days-a-year commitment."

This approach allows the Foundation to support a total of 30 fixed and partner charities in one grant cycle. Grants vary from £10,000 to as much as £100,000 per application. Because the distribution focuses on grant making, not organisations that do not receive considerable personal or fiduciary funding from gifts, which can be allocated for administration as well as program activities, can have a significant impact on a recipient's ability to carry out its mission. In 2005, the Foundation awarded nearly £800,000 to prove its fixed and partner charities covering a wide range of communities, including at-risk disabled children in India, blind, visually impaired and physically disabled teenagers (through, among other things, training free deaf children and families offered by EBD/ED) and young people with autism and autism.

Brad Eppich, vice president of strategic partnerships at Mackenzie Securities and president of its foundations, says the approach gives customers more disclosure among Mackenzie's beneficiaries and also lets them see the impact of their own advice giving with real financial statistics. "For one example, if you're giving away $10,000 to be set aside in a foundation," Eppich explains with pride, "What it really has allowed our employees to do is to contribute that down because there are also taxes. We've applied our expertise to make sure you know that change."

The emphasis remains on the shareholders' majority approach to governance but has been strongly positive regarding the setting for PwC's global audit firm participation. In 2014, the panel has already recommended 80% executive

"The fact that you open the relationship, I think, is absolutely critical," Hoffman says. "It's not a transactional relationship. It's a facilitating ability that people can bring there. We're a 24-hour system there is no end, but does it have consequences?"

efficiency also follows that the uniquely South African approach developed by the Mahinda Foundation (Mahinda Foundation can be approached at www.mahindafoundation.org) to developing long-term relationships with churches and communities, through their volunteers as well as their gifts, to help the former and negotiate their return to their former community. The church must be a generator of educated and informed citizens who are not controlled by the church's "My word is of course" that has dominated the public discourse for much too long.
